Economic and market update

September extended the volatile sideways movement in European equity markets into its fourth month. We think that markets are being held back by a confluence of economic, political and COVID-19-related factors at the moment, all of which should fade with a bit more time. Hence, we remain bullish in our mid and long-term outlook.

Performance, drivers and portfolio changes

Tactically, we had adopted a more cautious stance which served the fund well over the past month. Several short positions on cyclical stocks, index hedges and long positions in more defensive names were among the key contributors. For the moment we continue to maintain more defensive positioning but see more upside potential than downside risk. From today's standpoint, we would use further market weakness over the coming weeks to increase our exposure again. We believe equity markets will reach the point of maximum uncertainty over the course of this month and into early November, and once those uncertainties result in resolution and visibility improves we think that this could be good for markets.

Contribution to performance

Judging from the big macro indicators such as the purchasing managers' indices (PMIs), but also from the set of real-time alternative economic indicators, the summer slowdown in activity has given way to a modest reacceleration into autumn. The surge in US retail and housing demand has pushed inventories in these sectors to record lows. General manufacturing inventories are also falling rapidly and have reached quite low levels, though not yet historical extremes. This leaves some uncertainty as to the exact timing of a major restocking cycle, but it cannot be too far away in our view. Our guess is on an individual corporate level, many management teams are right now struggling with a tug of war between tight balance sheet management for liquidity and year-end credit rating assessments, required re-stocking given the better near-term order outlook, and 'just in case' inventory building to keep operations running smoothly in case of renewed harsher anti-virus measures. When those micro level decisions are becoming clearer, we believe they are likely to combine to lead to the biggest restocking cycle on record. As usual, the semiconductor cycle seems to run a bit ahead of the general industrial markets, and the signals we are getting are very encouraging indeed. Monthly shipment volumes are accelerating, distributor channels are being refilled and memory spot prices seem to have inflected upwards.

On the monetary front, the last few months have brought no incremental stimulus and central bank balance sheets have barely expanded. There are some well-publicised differences of opinion in the leadership of the US Federal Reserve (Fed) and the European Central Bank (ECB), but it seems likely to us that in the end the doves will win given the high under-employment rates and worsening headline inflation (or should we call it deflation?) data. This is particularly relevant for the eurozone data where core inflation is at its lowest-ever level and ECB staff projections already look outdated and too optimistic again. In the US, there may have been an element of the Fed holding off for the time being so as to not influence the outcome of the elections. Fiscal stimulus is similarly in a holding pattern on both sides of the Atlantic plus China, though again time seems very likely to bring progress. In Europe, the European Recovery Fund agreement should happen in November at the EU level, after which it is possibly another six months before it is ratified by all the national parliaments. Thus, its impact will likely only be felt from the second quarter of next year. In the US, it seems increasingly unlikely that both parties will find a compromise on the new stimulus package before the elections. Once done, it has the potential to happen quicker than in Europe. In China, the 14th five-year plan is to be decided at the end of October, and reports indicate it will also be combined with a 2035 strategic vision.

On the pandemic front, we acknowledge the Western world is faced with a second wave, but adjusted for the massively increased testing volume, the numbers are still much lower than in the spring. While backward looking, the hospitalisation rates, intensive care unit bed capacity utilisation levels and deaths are currently only a fraction of what we experienced in the first wave. We will have to learn to live with COVID-19 for a while. Although upcoming likely vaccine approvals by the FDA will create a lot of excitement, it does not change the world quickly. The hurdles for a vaccine are simply too low to have a clear picture to what extent these will really reduce morbidity, mortality, and limit onward transmission. Neither is it clear for how long the vaccines offer protection, and when it needs to be renewed, especially with a potentially mutating virus. Further, distribution and acceptance challenges could make it hard to declare reaching the herd immunity threshold throughout 2021. Hence, our politicians need to continuously update their learning for the many treatment progresses made. It is this element that is hardest to pin down, but again we are hopeful a point of maximum uncertainty will soon be reached. If hospitalisation rates, intensive care unit utilisations and death rates just do not rise to the same extent as the new case rates over the coming weeks, surely this will sway public opinion. Thus, it should force politicians to better balance anti-COVID-19 measures with the vast negative economic impacts and the just as dire consequences on non-COVID-19 health care and wellbeing.
